the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are aged 65 and over has increased by 1.5 million (1990–1999) and is projected to increase by a further 1.5 million by 2010 (Office of National Statistics 2000).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the health care needs of the ageing population. The Department of Health (2000) has set out a strategy for the future of health care for older people. The strategy is based on the following principles:

- To ensure that older people have access to the services they need to live as well as possible.
- To ensure that older people are treated as individuals and not as a homogeneous group.
- To ensure that older people are treated with respect and dignity.
- To ensure that older people are treated as equal citizens.

The strategy also sets out a number of key objectives for the future of health care for older people.

There is a growing awareness of the need to develop strategies to meet the needs of the ageing population. The Department of Health (2000) has identified the need to develop a new paradigm of care for the ageing population, one that is based on the concept of 'active ageing' and 'active living'.

The concept of 'active ageing' is defined by the World Health Organization (WHO) as 'the process of developing and maintaining the functional ability that enables people to participate in society' (WHO 1999). The concept of 'active living' is defined by the Department of Health (2000) as 'the process of developing and maintaining the functional ability that enables people to participate in society'.

The concept of 'active ageing' is based on the idea that people should be able to live independently and participate in society. This means that people should be able to live in their own homes, be able to move around, be able to communicate, and be able to participate in social activities. The concept of 'active living' is based on the idea that people should be able to live independently and participate in society.
